WILD LIFE

THE VO

The Vo are a riding animal, very graceful in appearance and their colours can vary greatly depending on the tastes of the farmer and who they are breeding the animals for. If the Vo are being bred for soldiers their typical colours will be white or black but some officers have been known to ride more fanciful Vo. The Vo have been known to use their beaks to scavenge.

THE BAHR

The Bahr are an annoying animal at times. The main body/head of the creature is incredibly dumb, content to just sit and eat grass or any tiny vermin that creep too closely. It takes the reptile tail to drive the creation to do anything, it is very common for Bahr to be covered in fang marks. A Bahr's meat is tainted in venom which makes them useless as a more common form of meat but there is a long curing process. To eat a Bahr meal it requires resting a Bahr's harvested meat in a marinade of Khylo supplied salt and aged wine within a barrel which is then buried under the sand and soil, covered by huge leafs. The butchers will leave additional markers so they do not lose their barrels along with very specific dates on when they were buried- for harvesting too soon will mean certain death to the Dreygsin that eats the meat and if not death then a very horrible few weeks of gut-wrenching plague.

At the end of the hundred years the meat will still be dangerous and must be enjoyed in small portions, no more than one in a single sitting. The meat is a delicacy, rich in herb and drunk in wine which it absorbs plenty of. It is best enjoyed raw but some more talented chefs have been known to experiment.

The juices left remaining in the barrel will be used as various exotic sauces, most with a very powerful spice that will burn the tongue. While there are poisons within the sauce it will not kill a Dreygsin, merely upset the gut if they are not accustomed to such a strong meal. It will certainly take the strongest of mortals to be able to handle the spice.

Bahr are very hard to breed as it requires the tails to get along first so when a match is finally made they are kept together for life- or as long as the tails put up with each other.

Bahr poisons are a very common tool among the farmers, using it to coat their blades in times of battle which makes fighting a farmer- a very stupid thing to do.

LILIU

Liliu are very big birds with resounding songs and beak clacks. They normally reside by water so farmers tending to these massive birds spend countless hours slaving over the health of the water upon their land as the sun can be very unkind. Priests within Abyonia go to bless the waters once a year, giving them some protection- to not receive a blessing is a foolish thing to do. Despite being capable of eating larger creatures the Liliu much prefer insects, specifically the massive locusts that can grow to the size of a small canine. The Liliu themselves are almost as tall as a Dreygsin, though there are some that become large enough to ride- those are more rare and generally sold to the palace where the Elders have them roam around their water gardens.

Liliu are very neutral birds, not outward aggressive nor very affectionate. A Liliu will not flee if a stranger approaches, nor will it budge much if it gets pet. Though much like many other creatures they have a limit to their patience and are fully capable of ripping off someone's limb and gobbling it down in seconds. Best to play it safe! Though the Liliu can form strong bonds with their favourite caretakers and will follow them around while they tend to their duties.

They are commonly used as pest control and their feathers collected for goods which range greatly. It is pointless to kill them as their feathers are valuable and grow back quickly season to season.

THE FAY

The Fay are funny little animals. There is no determined gender as all have cloacas for laying eggs except the rare tiny ones that produce no meat and lay no eggs. They are immortal and indestructible and have been known as "A God's Tiny Fury". While it is incredibly rare for one to be hatched and they are far weaker than their more living counterpart- they are kept around to act as mini alarm systems. So long as one of their bones, even just a fragment, remains- they will reform and near instantly in a poof of feathers. Should an intruder dare get near the Fay will throw themselves and peck and PECK AND PECK. Yes they hurt. Yes it is a minor inconvenience. But then what happens when their angry calls bring forth the farmer's herd of Fay? Dozens of little Fay will swarm the intruder/beast/danger and in a flurry of feathers they will peck. Unless the Farmer stops them the Fay will continue pecking until the danger is just a meat mass on the ground- and even then they are not happy and may continue their onslaught.

THE MAU

The mau are small felines that are mostly found on Ra Fallen land, it is written that the mau were gifted to Dreyg long before the fall of the ancients. They survived the culling of the ancient race and were on the other side to greet the newly risen Dreygsin.

They are friendly little creatures that can take the full appearance of a sleek black-haired kitty with a long crooked tail and sharp triangular ears. They have long limbs and move swiftly, even more so through the shadows and night. Some Mau are skeletal and they have a bad temperament.
